

Nancy and Will McDonald

The McDonalds are a quiet legend of El Paso history. They parented a large family, so large that the republicans accused them of creating voters to keep Nancy in office in perpetuity. The fact that they were able to rear such good kids during the congressional sessions is a testament to them.

When talking with or about Nancy and Will, so many great stories get told. One story of national significance is not really known to many. During his presidential bid, the late Morris Udall was in El Paso. Will and Nancy were supporters and avidly worked for him. At the point that Morris needed to depart, Will took him (albeit a little late) to the airport in a roofless vehicle to the airport. A combination of speed and chill resulted in Morris getting sick to the point of withdrawing from the presidential race. One always wonders what the world would be if Udall had been elected.
